Abstract

Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems among a sample of young adults in the United States. The study also examined the association between self-reported mental health problems and various demographic and psychosocial factors.

Methods: A cross-sectional survey was conducted using a nationally representative sample of young adults (ages 18-29) in the United States. The survey included questions about self-reported mental health problems, including depression, anxiety, and stress. Demographic and psychosocial factors were also measured, including age, gender, race, income, education, and social support.

Results: The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was 25.3%. The most common self-reported mental health problem was depression (12.1%), followed by anxiety (9.8%) and stress (3.4%). The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was significantly higher among females than males, and among those with lower income and education levels. The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was also significantly higher among those with lower social support.

Conclusions: The results of this study suggest that self-reported mental health problems are a significant public health concern among young adults in the United States. The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems is higher among females, those with lower income and education levels, and those with lower social support. Further research is needed to explore the underlying causes of self-reported mental health problems and to develop effective interventions to reduce their prevalence.
