

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether the use of a computer-based simulation could improve the performance of a group of students in a laboratory setting. The students were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group used a traditional laboratory setup, while the experimental group used a computer-based simulation. The results showed that the experimental group performed significantly better than the control group in terms of accuracy and speed. The study suggests that computer-based simulations can be an effective tool for improving student performance in a laboratory setting.
