

BERG/STRYER 8e STUDY GUIDE
CHAPTER 12

1. HOMEWORK 5, 6, 10, 19. This chapter presents the structures of several membrane lipids. You should be able to draw Phosphatidates with the head groups shown on page 345 (Fig 12.5). You should also know the structure of Sphingosine, Sphingomyelin, and Cerebroside (345-6). Know that Archaea have lipids without fatty acids or esters – a phytanyl ether is shown on 347. Compare phytol (green in Fig. 19.5) (p. 568). You should be able to draw the steroid nucleus or cholesterol (346). Understand that polar lipids form sheet-like assemblies, including the lipid bilayer membranes found around most cells and compartments in cells (Fig 12.8, 12.10). Membranes also contain roughly 25% to 75% protein, and this fact helps to make the membrane (like our skin) a “sense organ” for the cell. Receptors are generally transmembrane proteins, as are transport proteins for taking in food and excreting waste. You should be generally familiar with the list of membrane properties on page 342. The “Fluid Mosaic Model” of membrane structure (357) pictures proteins as capable of lateral diffusion, but not generally able to flip-flop or leave the membrane. The degree of fluidity of the lipid phase is determined by the number of unsaturated fatty acids and, in eukaryotes, the amount of cholesterol as well as by the temperature (357-8). Understand that carbohydrates can be attached to membranes either as glycolipids (e.g. gangliosides) or glycoproteins (attached to AsN, Ser, or Thr – examine Fig. 12.26 page 355). The oligosaccharides are usually on the outside of the membrane. ABO Blood group substances (Fig. 11.27 p. 331) are a good example. Know that prostaglandins come from arachidonic acid (Fig 12.21) and that Aspirin works by interfering with this (Fig. 12.24). In Fig 12.34, the membrane on the right is Gram-positive, and the one on the left is Gram-negative. Gram-negative bacteria have a “stomach” to digest their food in. Know which picture depicts which sort of bacterial membrane.
