design. The distinction, therefore, between tapestry and embroidery is, that, worked on a warp, as in Illustration 4, it is tapestry; worked on a mesh, as in Illustration 5, it is embroidery.

With regard, again, to lace. That is itself a web, independent of any groundwork or foundation where pattern is set on the warp, the threads of which are laid bare in the upper part of the illustration.

It is on just such upright lines of warp that all tapestry, properly so called, is worked—whether with the shuttle or with the needle makes no matter—and there is good reason, therefore, for the name of "tapestry stitch" to describe needlework upon the warp threads only of a material usually woven from which some of the web threads have been withdrawn.

The only difference between true tapestry and drawn work, an example of which is here given, is, that the one is done on a warp that has not before been woven upon, and the other on a warp from which the web threads have been withdrawn.
