When a patient is referred to the clinic, the first step is to take a detailed history. This includes a general history of the patient's health, a detailed history of the present illness, and a review of systems. The next step is to perform a physical examination. This includes a general physical examination, a detailed examination of the affected area, and a review of systems. The third step is to order appropriate laboratory and imaging studies. The fourth step is to develop a differential diagnosis. The fifth step is to initiate treatment. The sixth step is to monitor the patient's response to treatment. The seventh step is to provide patient education. The eighth step is to follow up with the patient. The ninth step is to document the patient's progress. The tenth step is to provide a final report to the referring physician.
