Public organizations often deliver valuable, low-cost, off-budget management training to young, talented leaders. Some training is more about strategy, leadership, or management in the broad sense, while others focus on developing specific skills that make important leaders more ready to manage. Training is critical for giving the important people inside your business the management capabilities that make them strong leaders, providing steady, great opportunities developing capabilities toward becoming better great people leaders. This doesn't mean to suggest management training is good for every one, or even for normal leaders to learn from leaders who aren't managers. (Coffman)
