Introduction
 The purpose of this study was to examine the effectiveness of a family-based intervention for adolescents with conduct problems and to explore the role of self-esteem and social support in the process. The study was conducted in a community sample of 100 adolescents (ages 12-17) and their parents. The intervention was a 12-week program that focused on improving family communication and problem-solving skills. The results showed that the intervention was effective in reducing delinquency and improving self-esteem and social support. The findings suggest that family-based interventions can be an effective way to address adolescent delinquency and improve family functioning.
