

Administration (2016) projects will worsen to as many as 250,000 workers by 2025. Access to mental health care is crucial given the societal upheaval brought about by the SARS COV-2 global pandemic.

To address the growing demand for mental health services, many communities and healthcare systems are exploring novel ways to integrate mental health treatment into primary care delivery, for example, using the Collaborative Care Model (Vanderlip et al., 2016). Nurses often contact people living with mental or behavioral health conditions while being treated for physical and medical conditions in both community and hospital settings. A recent focus on mental health care, particularly in outpatient settings, has been an emphasis in team-based models, telehealth, and integration of mental health and primary care with contributions from physicians, nurses, social workers, peer support, and community health workers – all of which can be beneficial relative to more traditional and
