

FIGURE 1. Arteriole and venule. I.s. Monkey. Plastic section. $\times 270$.

This longitudinal section of a large arteriole (A) and companion venule (Vr) from the connective tissue capsule of a monkey submandibular gland displays a duct (D) of the gland between submandibular gland displays a duct (D) of the gland between the two vessels. Observe that the thickness of the arteriole wall approximates the diameter of the lumen (L). The endothelial cell nuclei (N) are readily evident in both vessels, as are the smooth muscle cells (SM) of the tunica media. The arteriole also presents an internal elastic lamina (EL) between the tunica media and the endothelial cells. The tunica adventitia (TA) of the arteriole displays nuclei of fibroblasts, whereas those of the venule merge imperceptibly with the surrounding connective tissue. Glandular acini are evident in this field as are serous units (SU) and serous demilunes (SD).

In this photomicrograph of the monkey cerebellum, the molecular layer displays longitudinal sections of a capillary, here that the endothelial cell nuclei (N) are not axially in the field of view. The cytoplasm (Cy) of the highly attenuated endothelial cells is visible as thin, dark lines, bordering the lumen (L) of the capillary. Red blood cells (labeled) are noted to be distorted as they pass through the narrow lumen of the vessel. Inset. Capillary. x.s. Monkey. Plastic section. $\times 540$. This connective tissue represented in this photomicrograph displays bundles of collagen fibers (CF), nuclei of connective tissue cells (labeled), and a cross-section of a capillary (C), whose endothelial cell nucleus (N) is clearly evident.

This small arteriole (A) and its companion venule (Vr) are located subserosa of the tunica region of a monkey stomach. Observe the obvious difference between the diameters of the lumens (L) of the two vessels as well as the thickness of their walls. Due to the greater muscularity of the tunica media (TM) of the arteriole, the nuclei (N) of its endothelial cells bulge into its round lumen. The tunica media (TM) of the venule is much reduced, whereas the tunica adventitia (TA) is well developed and is composed of delugeous connective tissue (CT) interspersed with elastic fibers (not evident in this hematoxylin and eosin section).

This photomicrograph presents a villus from monkey duodenum, here the simple columnar epithelium (E) interspersed with occasional goblet cells (GC). The connective tissue lamina propria displays numerous plasma cells (PC), mast cells (MC), lymphocytes (L), and smooth muscle fibers (SM). The longitudinal section of the lumen (L) lined with endothelium (En) is a lacteal, a blind ending lymphatic channel. Since lymph vessels do not transport red blood cells, the lacteal appears to be empty, but in fact it contains lymph. Subsequent to a fatty meal, lacteals contain chylomicrons. Observe that the wall of the lacteal is very flimsy in relation to the diameter of the vessel.
