Abstract—This study examined the impact of the 2007–2008 recession on dependent family caregivers in need of treatment services. Results suggest an underappreciated underlying mental health burden in dependent family caregivers. In fact, findings of this study are consistent with a hypothesis that a recession may increase a person's reliance on family caregivers and, in turn, may increase the caregiver's reliance on treatment services. Thus, the findings of this study suggest that the recession may have increased the need for treatment services for dependent family caregivers.
