Comparing CP3 and BS 6399: Part 2 – ‘division by parts’ rule

N. J. Cook, PhD, CEng, FRSocE, FICE
Consulting engineer

Introduction

In my first feature¹ comparing CP3² and BS 6399: Part 2³ focused on misapplication of the CP3 rules for changes of roughness at the principal reason that BS 6399: Part 2 is universally perceived to give larger loads than CP3. However, there is one change between the two Codes that does tend to increase structural loads and that is the modification of the ‘division by parts’ rule – clause 3.3.2 of CP3 and clause 3.1.3.2 of BS 6399: Part 2.

The ‘division by parts’ rule in CP3

The rule as drafted, Clause 3.3.2 of CP3, permits the structure to be ‘divided into a number of convenient parts and the wind load on each part calculated, using a factor A_z that corresponds to the height above ground of the top of that part’ and for the load to be applied at the mid-height of each part. The intent of the original drafters was that ‘convenient parts’ would be interpreted as the major physical components of a structure, e.g. roofs, walls – possibly subdivided down to the storey level, but certainly no finer than that. The use of the term ‘convenient’ is typical of the definitions in CP3, which are frequently imprecise. This is a legacy of the original intent being over during the 8 years it took the draft to pass through its BSI committee stages, in which lack of precision serves to satisfy both sides of an argument since each side can place its own, different, interpretation on the meaning.

The rule as implemented. As CP3 began to be used, it quickly became clear that many designers were prepared to go much further than the drafters intended, dividing up their structures into many thin horizontal strips to bring as much advantage as possible from the rule. This was justified as being equivalent to the practice of ‘wind-tunnel’ tests in aerodynamic, bridge and chimney design applications, despite it being known that such theory applied only to three long, thin 2-dimensional structures. As they collected more information from full-scale and model-scale tests, it also became clear to the BS61 committees that the ‘division by parts’ rule was very far from the truth when dealing with typical building shapes. Only 2 years after CP3 was revised, the 1974 Wind Loading Handbook⁴ – the BS61 commentary to CP3 – expressed doubts on the use of the rule and strongly advised that it should not be used when calculating building loads.

Consequences to structural loads. If we take the BS61 advice and exclude chadding, we can examine the effect of the rule on structural loads at various levels down a building, bearing in mind that the structure at each level must face the total wind load on all the storeys above. If we take, for an example, a typical storey height, ten divide each building into horizontal strips only 1 m high, we can determine the reduction in overall horizontal shear force and bending moment at the bottom of each storey given by the rule for a range of building heights.

Figs 1 and 2 show the effect of the rule for buildings of three to six storeys in category 2 terrain, expressed as a percentage of the loads obtained for the building taken as a single part. The maximum benefit occurs at the base of a four-storey building; reducing loads to 71% of that of BS61 for moment. The effect on shear is always less than the effect on chord because the moment area forms the upper levels of the building where the effect is smaller. If the wind profile above 12m were to apply down to ground level, the rule would further reduce loads on buildings less than four storeys, but CP3 modifies the profile below 12m to account for ground surface effects, which prevents this. (The 1974 Wind Loading Handbook gives values of A_z in 1 m increments to 12m above ground in Table 7-2.3. As buildings get taller, the effect of the rule becomes increasingly less significant.

Past and current knowledge of wind pressures on buildings

First storey. Although the knowledge of flow around buildings and the wind pressure acting on them was sparse before 1960, when CP3 began to be drafted, it was known that wind speed increased with height above ground because of the effect of friction at the ground surface. The
