smaller veins, which transport cool blood from the gills back toward the body core (FIGURE 42.17a). The key is that the two types of blood flow are in opposite directions. As a result, the blood in the afferent vein, which is closest to the gills, is the warmest. As it flows toward the body, it passes over the efferent vein, which is cooler. This type of arrangement, with flow in opposite directions, is called a countercurrent exchange. The "exchanger" part of the name comes from the fact that the blood in the afferent vein is exchanged with the blood in the efferent vein. In a concurrent exchange system, the flow of blood in the afferent and efferent veins is in the same direction. This type of arrangement is called a concurrent exchange.
