

This longitudinal section of a large arteriole (A) and connective tissue venule (Vc) from the connective tissue septum of a monkey submandibular gland displays a duct (D) of the gland between the two vessels. Observe that the thickness of the arteriole wall approximates the diameter of the lumen (L). The endothelial cell nuclei (N) are readily evident in both vessels, as are the smooth muscle cells (SM) of the tunica media. The arteriole also presents an internal elastic lamina (EL) between the tunica media and the endothelial cells. The tunica adventitia (TA) of the arteriole displays nuclei of fibroblasts, whereas that of the venule merges imperceptibly with the surrounding connective tissue. Glandular acini are evident in this field as are serous cells (SC) and serous demilunes (DL).

In this photomicrograph of the monkey corneal endothelium, the molecular layer displays longitudinal sections of a capillary. Note that the endothelial cell nuclei (N) are not normally in the field of view. The cytoplasm (C) of the highly attenuated endothelial cells is visible as thin, dark lines, bordering the lumen (L) of the capillary. Red blood cells (R) are noted to be distorted as they pass through the narrow lumen of the vessel. Inset: Capillary, a.a. Monkey. Plastic section, x400. The connective tissue represented in this photomicrograph displays bundles of collagen fibers (CF), nuclei of connective tissue cells (nuc), and a cross-section of a capillary (C), whose endothelial cell nucleus (N) is clearly evident.

This small arteriole (A) and its venule (V) are located in the submucosa of the fundus region of a monkey stomach. Observe the obvious difference between the diameters of the arteriole and the venule as well as the thickness of their walls. Due to the greater muscularity of the tunica media (TM) of the arteriole, the nuclei (N) of its endothelial cells bulge into its round lumen. The tunica media (TM) of the venule is much reduced, whereas the tunica adventitia (TA) is well developed and is composed of dense loose connective tissue (CT) interspersed with elastic fibers (not evident in this hematoxylin and eosin section).

This photomicrograph presents a villus from mucosa of duodenum. Note the simple columnar epithelium (E) interspersed with some goblet cells (GC). The connective tissue lamina propria displays numerous plasma cells (PC), mast cells (MC), lymphocytes (L), and smooth muscle fibers (SM). The longitudinal section in the human GI lined with endothelium (EL) is a lacteal, a blind ending lymphatic channel. Since lymph vessels do not transport red blood cells, the lacteal appears to be empty. Due to fact a certain lymph, subsequent to a fatty meal, lacteals contain chylous mass. Observe that the wall of the lacteal is very thinner in relation to the diameter of the vessel.
