Abstract: The IMO's second-generation intact stability criteria (SGISc) have been applied to a set of seven megayacht units ranging from 40 m to 80 m. The application aims to evaluate their stability performance in a seaway. The assessment is based on two vulnerability levels, and the related criteria rely on the physics of the phenomena under investigation (dead ship condition, excessive acceleration, parametric rolling, pure loss of stability, and surf-riding). At the same time, SGISc provide methodological approaches to consider possible operational limitations related to the geographical area the vessel is meant to sail. Results of the comprehensive analysis carried out for the selected megayacht units are presented in term of limiting KG curves. Outcomes pointed out that inconsistencies among vulnerability levels still exist. Further comments about the relation of the investigated vessel typology and relevant operational profile have been reported. In addition, systematic analysis of the effect of the main design parameter on ship rules compliance has been carried out.

1. Introduction

Yachts have undergone significant changes in size in recent decades. In fact, we can certainly say that, in just 20 years, the average length of yachts and their gross tonnage have more than tripled, from 30–40 m yachts of the late 1990s to the current units that exceed 120 m. This growth in size has gone hand in hand with an evolution of the intended use: from mainly coastal use with short crossings, to longer crossings in open seas, therefore with possibly demanding weather conditions. Furthermore, while the first yachts were intended for private use, recently we witnessed the development of the charter mode, implying the guests pay for the temporary usage of the yacht, creating a condition similar to passenger ship commercial exploitation. Moreover, since they are meant to be luxury assets, yachts offer increasingly versatile and elegant layouts together with technologically demanding performance, e.g., the Ice Class features are used if guests want to enjoy a cruise in seas with the presence of ice. This rapid development from both a commercial and a technological point of view has forced rule-making bodies to consistently upgrade safety rules in order to guarantee adequate safety standards [1]. From this perspective, standards related to intact and damaged stability have been addressed and, at present, they are basically in line with SOLAS requirements. Following this trend, as already examined in previous works Annex 9 of [2], it seems appropriate to investigate the compliance of modern yacht units to the Second Generation Intact Stability criteria (SGISc) established by the International Maritime Organization (IMO) [3]. This innovative stability rule framework focuses on the influence of waves on vessel stability, overcoming the limitations of the traditional criteria based on stability assessment in calm water.
