

Temporary support: assessing loads above openings in external walls

Many buildings require minor structural alteration or repair around openings during the course of their life. Others may require enlarged or new openings. Because loads above openings can vary considerably, care is needed to provide sufficient temporary support during these operations. BRE site surveys reveal that loads above openings are often seriously underestimated, leading to inadequate temporary support and a risk of structural movement or even partial collapse during works. For surveyors and builders this guide gives a simple procedure for assessing loads above lintels in traditionally-built brick or brick and block housing up to three storeys. This edition has been amended to allow greater accuracy in the estimation of wall and roof loads, and is now complemented by GBG 15 which gives guidance on appropriate temporary support measures. Where there is doubt about the nature of the construction or if unusual loads are suspected, specific structural advice should be obtained. Guidance on whether or not lintels require replacement is given in GBG 1.

Why it is important to assess load

When repairing or altering openings, removal of the existing lintel is often necessary. Before starting work it is essential to establish the construction and assess the loads which bear at the lintel level. In some cases the construction bearing on the lintel (shaded) may require only minimal temporary support during works (below left), but sometimes major loads must be carried (right).

Loading terms used in this guide

The working span is the length of the original or replacement lintel (whichever is the longer) plus an allowance (one full brick at each end of the lintel) for removing or placing a lintel.

The load triangle (dark grey) is a triangle of wall with a base length equal to the working span and with base angles of 45° . All the masonry within the load triangle (and all other loads supported on this masonry) must be included in loading estimates.

The interaction zone (light grey area) is a chevron shape outside the load triangle with outer angles of 60° . Roof or floor loads bearing in this zone must be included in loading estimates.

The application level (coloured line) is a line level with the uppermost bearing surface of the lintel.
