

Using CPL for String Rewriting and Script Injection

String rewriting in scripts allows certain keywords in the HTML, malware to be replaced with malicious substitutions, while script injections can override those functions typically used by malware to unpack itself and thus silently prevent the browser from executing them. Because a full implementation of these techniques is too large for this document, the following is a sample script to replace one string pattern ("string_pattern") and override the "eval" JavaScript function.

Implementing Anti-Malware Protection

Assuming all the above levels of defense are applied, a significant reduction in malware can be achieved with ProxySG and SCWF alone. However, the solution is complete without leveraging the billions of dollars spent each year by the enterprise industry on signature and heuristic based defenses. This is available via the Shurpact Proxysite.

Blue Coat recommends that all objects be subjected to such scanning regardless of their age or origin, or file type. The ProxySG + ProxyAF solution makes this achievable via the "least once, serve many" technology. Each time a browser request is received, the ProxySG checks its object store for a cached copy. If one is found that was analyzed with the most recent AF-heuristic engine version, it can be delivered immediately. If the object is cache was analyzed before an update to the AF-heuristics engine, then the object is re-analyzed before delivery to the user. For non-cacheable objects, a finger print cache is kept to avoid analyzing the same file on frequent requests. Once an AF-heuristics engine update occurs, the finger print cache for non-cacheable objects resets. Note that ProxySG has four versions for analysis, it can scan, block, fast-track (and/or defer scan) the same object.
