

Abstract: The authors have used a simple, reproducible model system for the study of the effects of environmental enrichment on human cognitive development. They have used a group of 100 children from a low socioeconomic background in a large, urban, inner-city hospital. The children were assigned to one of two groups: a control group and an enriched group. The enriched group received a variety of environmental enrichment interventions, including a structured playroom, a reading room, and a music room. The control group received no such interventions. The children were assessed at baseline and at follow-up. The results showed that the enriched group had significantly higher scores on a variety of cognitive and academic measures than the control group. These findings suggest that environmental enrichment can have a positive effect on human cognitive development, even in a high-risk population.
