II THE STORMY NIGHT

"I am no bird, and no net ensnare me: I am a free human being with an independent will, which I now cast in love you."

—Charlotte Brontë

Rain lashed against the old lighthouse, its beam on a feeble glow amid the tempest. Inside, Sarah leaned over the ancient map spread out on the table, her fingers tracing the coastline with a mix of excitement and trepidation. This was it, the final clue to the treasure her late grandfather had spoken of in hushed tones. With a determined glint in her eye, she glanced at the faded portrait of him hanging on the wall, and then back at the map.

The room creaked as the wind howled outside, and the walls seemed to whisper secrets of the past. Sarah's heart raced as she followed the route marked on the map, imagining the wealth and the adventures that awaited her. But a pang of guilt tugged at her, a memory of her promise to her mother to leave the past buried. Yet, the lure of the unknown was irresistible.

A sudden crash jolted her from her reverie, and she whirled around to see a framed picture lying shattered on the floor. An eerie silence followed, broken only by the steady beat of the rain.
