'We are most of us governed by epistemologies that we know to be wrong': Gregory Bateson's observation summarizes what motivates Keith Jenkins's latest book.⁽¹⁾ In this collection of essays written and published over the last 15 years (including not only a foreword by Hayden White and an afterword by Alun Munslow, but also responses from Perez Zagorin and Michael C. Coleman repudiating the postmodernist thought-style) 'wrong epistemology' defines the cognitive routines and disciplinary practices that produce historical knowledge. To anyone familiar with Jenkins's books the import of these essays will not be surprising, particularly since, both in brief comments helpfully contextualizing each essay and the particularly incisive introduction, 'History limited', he himself indicates their common synergy. Even so, precisely as a collection of occasional pieces evincing an unwavering conviction, At the Limits of History provides an occasion to reflect on the dispute between the modernist, historicizing mentality and postmodernist strategies of differentiation, and on what in this confrontation exactly is at stake.

Hegemony, the social and cultural dominance of the cognitive norms evinced in history-focussed behaviour, the practices producing historical knowledge; authority, the self-entitlement to credibility always already politically and culturally invested in the historian-function, in what it is to be a historian and to do history: these are consistently in At the Limits of History the targets of Jenkins's critique. This critique is 'crucially' indebted to Nietzsche – particularly to his insight that knowledge is inherently pragmatic, an expression of will-to-power, and to Lyotard – suggesting his findings that under postmodern conditions knowledge is validated only in performative terms (p. 169). Given, as Ernest Gellner remarks, that 'norms of knowledge provide a court of appeal for normative issues in other spheres', so that 'what ethical, political, economic and other norms are found to be acceptable, depends in the end on ... which cognitive norms are held to be compelling', the epistemological critique of the hegemony and authority of historical norms cannot but turn political.⁽²⁾ This explains why in the 1994 essay, 'Marxism and historical knowledge', Jenkins vindicates a non-historicizing conception of Marxism by stressing that society, being rather 'an incessantly mobile set of discursive (and thus contingent) relationships', is hardly a 'stable object' underpinning 'accumulating /lasting knowledge' (p. 25); why in the 2003 essay, 'On disobedient histories', he rejects a 'credible authoritative or authoritarian historicized past that one has to defer to over one's own personal history', derogates from the 'currently stultifying academic/professional doxa', and would 'prize open the mental strait-jacket of modernist historical thinking' (p. 151); why, too, in the 2004 essay, 'Modernist disavowals and postmodern reminders of the condition of history today: On Jean-François Lyotard', in order to counter
