Animals living in the wild are particularly vulnerable in natural disasters. Earthquakes, hurricanes, volcanic eruptions, tsunamis, and forest fires can have devastating consequences. Many animals die, drowned or buried alive by dirt, ash, lava, or snow; crushed to death in collapsed or burnt burrows; smashed against trees and rocks, or pelted by hailstones. Others sustain major injuries, including cuts and abrasions to the eyes, wings and gills; respiratory and digestive disorders, eroded teeth; malnutrition; and poisoning from contaminated food and water. Strong volcanic eruptions and fires can temporarily change regional weather, cooling or heating the air, changing winds, or causing rain. Volcanoes, storms, and floods can kill marine animals directly, or cause long-term problems by depositing debris and affecting the temperature and salinity of water. All of this contributes to health problems for marine animals, while changing the circulation of water, which further affects nutrient availability and water temperature.

A disaster is defined in human terms as a catastrophic event that exceeds a community's capacity to respond without external assistance. Although some definitions only include events that affect humans, nonhuman animals are also affected in large numbers and often lack the ability and resources they need to adjust to the aftermath of a disaster. Usually, natural disasters that harm humans also harm nonhuman animals. Even unusual natural events that are mild by human standards can be catastrophic to animals living in the wild.

The factors that influence the survival of a nonhuman animal in a natural disaster include: the specific adaptations her species has, the stage of life she is in, whether or not it is breeding season, whether she is migratory or has other means of escape, and the particular habitat she lives in. Other factors she might be coping with are her physical condition or ability to take care of herself. Animals with sharp eyesight, hearing, or other senses are more likely to escape, as are birds who can fly away and larger animals who can run quickly. Small animals can drown more easily, have their burrows inundated by floods or heavy rains, or be crushed or burned when they are trapped with no way to escape.

Animals may be displaced, either because they moved to safer places or because they were swept away by high winds or rushing flood waters. If displaced animals are crowded together in a small area, they risk major outbreaks of disease and parasite infestations. Malnutrition and starvation due to limited food supplies also become major risks. The animals might also be affected by exposure to sun, cold, or wind if they do not have adequate shelter.

For humans, public and private resources are spent to reduce risks and mitigate harms from collapsing buildings, fires, floods, landslides, and lack of food and water. Most human deaths worldwide from natural disasters come from collapsing buildings. Nonhuman animals also lose their homes and parts of their habitats that they need to survive, but they don't have access to modern technology or disaster planning agencies. Whether or not an animal can cope with a natural disaster and its aftermath has a lot to do with a combination of factors that are mostly beyond their control.
