

venturers par excellence. (Of course, not everyone in the United States took the OSS seriously. The irreverent had speculated that the famous acronym might well stand for "oh so silly," or "oh so secret," or even "oh so social.") General Donovan chose well—in fact better than he realized—when he asked Ilya Tolstoy, a grandson of Leo Tolstoy, to head the expedition.

Ilya Tolstoy was courageous and experienced as an explorer. He had fought with the White Russian cavalry during the Russian Revolution and, later in life, had led expeditions to central Asia and to Africa. He was also, in a special way, prepared for Tibet and its way of life. As a child he had, with his sister, spent his formative years with his grandfather at Yasnaya Polyana, his country estate (PLATE 1). The elder Tolstoy was profoundly interested in teaching children. He believed they should come to terms with nature and poetry, which he believed formed the foundation of religious thought. He also believed, as did the Tibetans, that students should begin early to develop their inner lives. And perhaps even more to the point, he believed that living was intertwined with, and even synonymous with, religious experience. Ilya and his sister had the benefit of their grandfather's educational theories and of the instructive tales he wrote for children.¹ It seems unlikely that the adult Ilya would have forgotten his grandfather's lessons when he went to Tibet. They had certainly helped prepare him to understand and to document quite sensitively the way of life he found there.

When Tolstoy was asked to choose a man to accompany him on the expedition, he immediately selected Brooke Dolan—a natural choice. Dolan was well educated (he had attended both Princeton and Harvard), perceptive, and an experienced explorer. He had already led two expeditions for Philadelphia's august Academy of Natural Sciences to the Kham and Amdo regions of eastern Tibet (an area which even then was partially controlled by China). He brought back several rare specimens from these expeditions, including a giant panda and a Tibetan takin. His takin specimen—the takin is a ruminant, a rare relation of the goat—is still the only such specimen in the West. Both panda and takin remain on exhibit at the academy.
