

Writing Effective UCAS References

UCAS references can often be crucial in determining whether a university makes an offer to an applicant. Universities receive a high volume of applications and often have to make difficult decisions about very similar candidates. Providing an understanding of an applicant's achievements within their education and home context is important. Often the reference can be the one thing that sets an applicant apart from another. The universities rely on teachers, as educational professionals, to provide informed assessments of applicants.

Contextual Information

The school referee should always begin the reference with some contextual information about the school or college. The most useful is information that universities will not know from the UCAS form. For example, the proportion of students eligible for free school meals, the percentage who progress to Oxbridge or Russell Group universities, any resource or timetabling constraints – ones which might limit a student's choice in subjects to study, and the school's typical provision. It's therefore really important that the referee put the most relevant contextual information in the reference.

Structure

There is no set structure to a reference, however, universities recommend that it has a split of being 80% focused on academic information and 20% extra-curricular information. Also, the word limit is 4000 characters or 47 lines. The reference should include:

- > Background on the school and the applicant
- > Information on their academic performance at post-16
- > Subject by subject reports (with the most relevant subject first)
- > Information on their suitability for the course and higher education
- > Information on their extra-curricular activities and personality (relevant information)

Subject information should include:

- > Comments on the applicant's academic performance at post-16
- > Performance in relation to their peers – this is really helpful to universities
- > Any achievements and interest in specific modules
- > Academic qualities and skills
- > The student's potential for academic success at university
- > Super-curricular activities (extra activities directly related to their course of study)
- > Any explanations for predicted grades
- > The student's suitability for their chosen course
- > Explain any changes in their performance; universities will question a big jump from GCSE achievement to A Level predictions.
- > Include any mitigating circumstances – with the agreement of the applicant
- > Include if your school does not offer particular subjects, especially if it has affected that particular applicant
- > Make sure the style of writing is consistent throughout the reference
- > Provide evidence that the applicant is suited to the course
- > Build a picture of the student, including their approach to study
- > Include any involvement in outreach activities
- > Extract and combine information from subject teachers; e.g. "several teachers.."
- > Involve the applicant in the process
