

Using CPL for String Rewriting and Script Injection

String rewriting in scripts allows certain keywords in the HTML, moreover to be replaced with malicious substitutions, while script injection can override those functions typically used by malware to unpack itself and thus silently prevent the browser from executing them. Because a full implementation of these techniques is too large for this document, the following is a sample script to replace one string pattern ("string_pattern") and override the "eval" JavaScript function.

Implementing Anti-Malware Protection

Assuming all the above levels of defense are applied, a significant reduction in malware can be achieved with ProxySG and SCWF alone. However, the solution is complete without interrupting the billions of dollars spent each year by the software industry on signature and heuristic based defenses. This is available via the Shur Coat Proxikit.

Blue Coat recommends that all objects be subjected to such scanning regardless of their source or origin, or file type. The ProxySG + ProxyWAF solution makes this workable via the "scan once, serve many" technology. Each time a browser request is received, the ProxySG checks its object store for a cached copy. If one is found that was analysed with the most recent AV-heuristics engine version, it can be delivered immediately. If the object is either new, analysed before an update to the AV-heuristics engine, then the object is re-analysed before delivery to the user. For non-cacheable objects, a finger print cache is kept to avoid analysing the same file on frequent requests. Once an AV-heuristics engine update occurs, the finger print cache for non-cacheable objects resets. Note that ProxyWAF has four versions for analysis. It can scan, block, fast-track (add to object store for long term object), or
