Building and Leading New Academic Programs in Higher Education Gretchen Oltman, Jackie Clark, 2025-02-18

Designing, creating, and leading new degree programs can be an arduous and unpredictable task for any college or university faculty member. Faculty typically trained within a specific discipline and who are charged with creating new degree programs are rarely prepared for the process. In addition to being ill-prepared, faculty and academic leaders often face administrative hurdles such as understanding complex approval processes, conducting market research, and preparing selling points to gain peer and administrative approval, and ensuring new degrees and programs are seamlessly built into campus structures.

Building and Leading New Academic Programs in Higher Education: A Practical Guide for Faculty is a practical handbook and necessary companion for any faculty member tasked with starting a new major or degree program at the college level, from bachelors to doctoral. Based on the practical, lived experiences of the authors, who have both proposed, built, and led new successful degree programs, this book provides the structural insights and often unspoken list of chores faculty must consider when beginning a new college or university academic program.
