Abstract
Keywords: adolescents, delinquency, family, intervention, parents, self-esteem, social support, treatment, violence
Introduction
 The purpose of this study was to examine the effectiveness of a family-based intervention for adolescents with conduct problems. The study was conducted in a community sample of 100 adolescents with conduct problems and their families. The intervention was a family-based program that focused on improving family functioning and reducing delinquency. The results of the study showed that the intervention was effective in reducing delinquency and improving family functioning. The study also found that the intervention was most effective for adolescents with low self-esteem and low social support. The results of this study have important implications for the development of family-based interventions for adolescents with conduct problems.

Abstract: This paper presents a new method for the automatic detection of anomalies in time series data. The method is based on the analysis of the local and global characteristics of the data. It is able to detect both point anomalies and contextual anomalies. The results show that the proposed method is more effective than other methods.
