Basilissa John Buchan, 2020-07-16 When Vernon was a very little boy he was the sleepest of mortals but in the spring he had seasons of bad dreams and breakfast became an idle meal Mrs Ganthony greatly concerned sent for Dr Moreton from Axby and homely remedies were prescribed It is the spring fever said the old man It gives the gout to me and nightmares to this baby it brings lads and lasses together and scatters young men about the world An antique complaint Mrs Ganthony But it will right itself never fear Ver non semper viret Chuckling at his ancient joke the doctor mounted his horse leaving the nurse only half comforted What fidgets me she told the housekeeper is the way his lordship holds his tongue For usual he ll shout as lusty as a whelp But now I finds him in the morning with his eyes like moons and his skin white and shiny and never a cheep has he given the whole blessed night with me laying next door and it open and a light sleeper at all times Mrs Wace ma am Every year the dreams came generally for his springs were spent at Severns in the big new night nursery at the top of the west wing which his parents had built not long before their death It had three windows looking over the moorish flats which run up to the Lancashire fells and from one window by craning your neck you could catch a glimpse of the sea It was all hung too with a Chinese paper whereon pink and green parrots squatted in wonderful blue trees and there seemed generally to be a wood fire burning Vernon s recollections of his childish nightmare are hazy He always found himself in a room different from the nursery and bigger but with the same smell of wood smoke People came and went such as his nurse the butler Simon the head keeper Uncle Appleby his guardian Cousin Jennifer the old woman who sold oranges in Axby and a host of others Nobody hindered them from going away and they seemed to be pleading with him to come too There was danger in the place something was going to happen in that big room and if by that time he was not gone there would be mischief But it was quite clear to him that he could not go He must stop there with the wood smoke in his nostrils and await the advent of a terrible Something But he was never quite sure of the nature of the compulsion He had a notion that if he made a rush for the door at Uncle Appleby s heels he would be allowed to escape but that somehow he would be behaving badly Anyhow the place put him into a sweat of fright and Mrs Ganthony looked darkly at him in the morning Vernon was nine before this odd spring dream began to take definite shape at least he thinks he must have been about that age The dream stage was emptying There was nobody in the room now but himself and he saw its details a little more clearly It was not any apartment in the modern magnificence of Severns Rather it looked like one of the big old panelled chambers which the boy remembered from visits to Midland country houses where he had arrived after dark and had been put to sleep in a great bed in a place lit with dancing firelight In the morning it had looked only an ordinary big room but at that hour of the evening it had seemed an enchanted citadel The dream room was not unlike these for there was the scent of a wood fire and there were dancing shadows but he could not see clearly the walls or the ceiling and there was no bed In one corner was a door which led to the outer world and through this he knew that he might on no account pass Another door faced him and he knew that he had only to turn the handle and enter it But he did not want to for he understood quite clearly what was beyond There was another room like the first one but he knew nothing about it except that opposite the entrance another door led out of it Beyond was a third chamber and so on interminably There seemed to the boy no end to this fantastic suite He thought of it as a great snake of masonry
