

Alternative

To keep the curved movement small, play the grace note as a double stop throughout the exercise:

93

Based on martelé

Solid staccato is like a series of rapid martelé strokes all in one bow.*

- When there are only a few strokes in each bow, make very heavy bites at the beginning of each staccato by catching the string heavily, and immediately play the rest of the stroke piano. As more and more strokes are added, gradually play with a smaller and smaller bite.
- Play with the same curved stroke as in the previous exercise.
- Feel how the stick wants to bounce out of the string after each attack, even when there are many strokes all in one bow and the bite has become very slight.

Play on each string.

94

String crossings

String crossings can spoil an otherwise good staccato. This exercise covers all the possibilities in the same way as Exercise 53.

- Play with a metronome, beginning slowly at $\text{♩} = 60$ and gradually increasing to $\text{♩} = 120$.
- Play up- and down-bow, in the upper half throughout.
- Play with a strong rhythmic pulse, practising with a strong accent at the beginning of every group of four notes. Later, feel the accents without sounding them.

* See Martelé, page 63. Martelé is an example of a technique that has a speed limit: beyond a certain speed it is impossible to catch the string before each stroke. The obvious, instinctive solution is to join the strokes together in one bow, which is then called staccato. Other examples of speed limits are spiccato, which beyond a certain speed turns into sautillé, and the action of raising and dropping fingers individually, which turns into "block" (see page 139).
