Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors for coronary artery disease between men who had been exposed to asbestos and those who had not. A case-control study was conducted among men aged 60 years or older who resided in the United States from 1978 to 1982. Cases were defined as men who had died from coronary artery disease during the study period. Controls were defined as men who had died from causes other than coronary artery disease during the same period. Data were obtained from death certificates, medical records, and interviews with family members. The results showed that the prevalence of risk factors for coronary artery disease was significantly higher among men who had been exposed to asbestos compared to those who had not. This finding suggests that exposure to asbestos may increase the risk of developing coronary artery disease.
