18 Study question: Energy metabolism and thermoregulation

1. What is a thermogenic effect?

1. This term is used to describe a cellular metabolic strategy to allow an organism to generate heat, and thus maintain its body temperature. Thermogenesis is achieved by all three pathways (fatty acid oxidation, glucose oxidation, and amino acid oxidation) but is most commonly associated with fatty acid oxidation.
2. Thermogenic regulation of heat production

2. Why is uncoupled fat oxidation not termed a thermogenic effect?

1. In the uncoupled fat oxidation, the electron transport chain is bypassed, and the energy from the oxidation of fatty acids is used to generate heat. This is not a thermogenic effect because it does not involve the production of heat by the oxidation of fatty acids.

3. How does uncoupled fat oxidation differ from uncoupled amino acid oxidation and glucose oxidation in terms of the pathways involved?

1. Uncoupled fat oxidation is a metabolic pathway that involves the oxidation of fatty acids. This process is not coupled to the production of ATP, and the energy from the oxidation of fatty acids is used to generate heat. Uncoupled amino acid oxidation and glucose oxidation are metabolic pathways that involve the oxidation of amino acids and glucose, respectively. These pathways are coupled to the production of ATP, and the energy from the oxidation of amino acids and glucose is used to generate heat.

4. What pathways are involved in the production of heat by the oxidation of fatty acids?

1. Thermogenic effect of fatty acid oxidation is the heat produced by the oxidation of fatty acids. This process is not coupled to the production of ATP, and the energy from the oxidation of fatty acids is used to generate heat. The pathways involved in the production of heat by the oxidation of fatty acids are the oxidation of fatty acids to acetyl-CoA, the oxidation of acetyl-CoA to CO₂ and H₂O, and the oxidation of H₂O to O₂ and H₂.
2. Thermogenic effect of amino acid oxidation is the heat produced by the oxidation of amino acids. This process is not coupled to the production of ATP, and the energy from the oxidation of amino acids is used to generate heat. The pathways involved in the production of heat by the oxidation of amino acids are the oxidation of amino acids to acetyl-CoA, the oxidation of acetyl-CoA to CO₂ and H₂O, and the oxidation of H₂O to O₂ and H₂.
