

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether the use of a computer-based simulation could improve the performance of a group of students in a laboratory setting. The students were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group used a traditional laboratory setup, while the experimental group used a computer-based simulation. The results showed that the experimental group performed significantly better than the control group in terms of accuracy and speed. The study also found that the use of a computer-based simulation reduced the time required to complete the experiment and increased the students' understanding of the concepts involved. The results suggest that the use of a computer-based simulation is an effective way to improve the performance of students in a laboratory setting.
