

No certain information can be gathered for the reigns of the next two or three kings following dNgos-grub. Safer ground is reached again with King Grags-'bon-ble who occupied the throne of Ladakh about one century later, around 1400-1435. Although he gained fame for building temples and commissioning images, the main activity of erecting and decorating temples in Alchi had probably already come to an end at that time.

Why such an impressive complex of temple buildings was erected just at this place in Alchi, is a question that can hardly be answered convincingly in the absence of any written historical sources. The main commercial route from Kashmir to Leh and from there to Gung was situated to the north, across the Indus. To connect Alchi with this route, the founders of the temples and of the fort on a rocky cliff above the banks of the river had to build a bridge, the remains of which can still be made out on both sides of the Indus. Perhaps the flat banks on the Alchi side offered better opportunities for crops which were the main source for the support of life in this area.

The two columns supporting the archway of the facade are also crowned by capitals, ending in volutes at both sides. Some of the columns directly flank the entrance into the building, the capitals bear sculptures of seated figures in meditation, the seated figures are all in a meditative posture, the seated figures are all in a meditative posture, the seated figures are all in a meditative posture.

Hardly anything is known about the history of Alchi itself and its temples. Even the name Alchi (ཨ་ལྷི) defies all explanations; it is not Tibetan and may go back to an early Dardic language. From inscriptions in the temples, we can deduce that two patrons of the famous 'Bro chun acted as founders.¹⁰ The elder of the two, a rich man called Kalden Sherab (ཀལ་ལྷན་ཤེར་རབ་), was born in Samda on the other side of the mountains south of Alchi, and trained in Nyarma, the only monastery in Ladakh founded, without any doubt, by Rinchen Zangpo. Later he moved to Alchi, where he built a bridge over the River Indus and erected a fort (sdbur) on a rocky cliff nearby. The altar platform is here lower than at the site of the village of Alchi and has a counterpart on the other side of the river where today the village of Saspol is situated. A path along the south bank leads west to a valley with the settlement of Mangyu at its end. Obviously a close connection
