It is also possible that we observed a subtle, but significant, difference between the two groups in the way they perceived the information. The two groups may have perceived the information differently, which could have influenced their decision-making process. This is a possibility that we cannot rule out.

It is important that programs, especially those which seek to be self-sustaining and self-replicating, planning space in themselves. While the management system should include a management information system, it is essential that the system also provide for a fairly substantial and often changing reserve fund with sufficient funds to be sufficient to fund all the activities and contingencies in the planning. It is important that the system also have sufficient planning and reporting system to monitor and report on the system's performance.
