Consumer Behaviour Chris Rice, 1993 Behavioural Aspects of Marketing Keith C Williams, 1981-01-01

Behavioural science is increasingly becoming recognized as a necessary part of a marketer's skills. Keith Williams provides a review of the main areas of behavioural research and examines in depth their specific relevance to marketing. Cognitive influences on the individual: perception, learning and motivation are discussed first, followed by the social factors: the nature of society, attitudes, communication and personality. The relationship between cognitive and social influences as it affects marketing is pinpointed in a chapter on modelling consumer behaviour and the decision making process. The book features sections on behavioural aspects of the organization and the individual within the organization, and the author demonstrates that these considerations, along with consumer orientated studies, can play a decisive role in marketing. Each chapter includes diagrams and reading lists. Written specifically for the Chartered Institute of Marketing and CAM Certificate courses.
