Accommodating Cultural Diversity and Achieving Equity

An Introduction to Psychological Dimensions of Multiculturalism

John W. Berry¹ and David L. Sam²

¹Department of Psychology, Queen's University, Kingston, ON, Canada,

²Department of Psychosocial Sciences, University of Bergen, Norway

In all culturally diverse societies, there has been a shift in public policy and public attitudes in recent decades, away from assuming that there is an inevitable process of cultural and psychological homogenization underway and the image of modern society as a "Melting Pot." The shift has been toward a view that accepts that diversity is a fact of contemporary life and likely to continue for generations, with the concept of "Multiculturalism" providing a contrast to the "melting pot." Even more recently, this shift in policy and attitudes has swung back away from multiculturalism in many countries, and returned toward the image of a homogeneous society with "one people, one language, and one identity." The debate between these two images has been highly political, but it has also been the object of some psychological and social science research. In Europe, this debate has been more front-and-center than anywhere else.

This special issue of European Psychologist, coordinated by us on behalf of the journal's editor-in-chief Alexander Grob, is devoted to the portrayal of some psychological aspects of these issues. In the call for papers, we requested scholars to submit papers of two kinds:

- (1) Integrative papers that focus on key conceptual issues from a European or a comparative perspective. These might include: the very conception of multiculturalism; its relationship to immigration; public and private attitudes; discrimination; and the role of security and threat.
- (2) Empirical review papers that focus on research findings on these issues in different regions of Europe. These might include: Western Europe; Northern Europe; Southern Europe; Eastern Europe.

We received many proposals, and after a selection and review process, this special issue now contains five papers that address various psychological aspects of living in a number of multicultural societies in Europe. Two of the articles focus on general features of the acculturation process and the psychological and sociocultural adaptations that result. One examines these processes and outcomes among immigrant youth in Germany (Frankenberg, Kupper, Wagner, & Hongard, 2013) while the other reports on research with internal adult migrants in Russia (Lebedeva & Tatarko, 2013). The other three papers each have a more specific focus on social institutions – education, sport, and religion. The role of multicultural education in promoting positive interethnic attitudes is discussed by Verkuyten and Thijs (2013). The role of sport in fostering intergroup harmony is examined by Hatzigeorgiadis, Morela, Elbe, Kouti, and Sanchez (2013). Finally, the core issue of religion in multicultural Europe is considered by Güngör, Fleischmann, Phalet, and Maliepaard (2013).

A parallel special issue examining multiculturalism outside Europe is being published in the International Journal of Intercultural Relations (IJIR), edited by Chan Hoong Leong (Singapore National University) and James Liu (Victoria University of Wellington, New Zealand). This contains eight papers including an introduction by the editors (Leong & Liu, in press), and articles that examine the state of multiculturalism among selected countries in North America (Berry, in press; Doucerais, Dere, & Ryder, in press), Southeast Asia (Noor & Leong, in press), Africa (Ng & Verkuyten, in press), Latin America (Sirlapu & van Oudenhoven, in press), and Oceania (Sibley & Ward,
