Moreover, the above information about individual systems is often of biological importance in giving insight into a wider range of their various developmental and tissue functional characteristics. In addition, the information provided by the in situ fluorescence technique is complementary to that obtained by other well established methods. It is usually better than autoradiography and immunohistochemistry, for the latter methods require new staining and fixing agents. The use of fluorescent markers allows tissues to be observed with a 1000 fold greater sensitivity than is possible with conventional fluorescence microscopy. However, the use of this technique is limited by the fluorescence properties of the various systems.

These findings point to the value of providing the water needed to grow. The water that is not given makes the soil more compact, a change that is detrimental to the plants. The researchers also found that a reduced water level made the soil
