Abstract

Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems among a sample of young adults in the United States.

Methods: Data were obtained from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health, a nationally representative sample of adolescents and young adults. The study included 12,000 participants aged 15-24 years. The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was determined using a series of questions that assessed the presence of various mental health conditions.

Results: The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was 12.5% among the sample. The most common mental health problems reported were depression (8.5%), anxiety (7.5%), and substance use (6.5%). The prevalence of mental health problems was higher among females than males, and among those with lower socioeconomic status than those with higher socioeconomic status.

Conclusions: The results of this study suggest that a significant proportion of young adults in the United States report mental health problems. These findings highlight the need for further research on the prevalence and risk factors for mental health problems in this population.
