In recent years, our knowledge of what goes on in our Ocean has been transformed. But there's a lot more to be discovered. We're using new tools and techniques to explore new worlds, revealing extraordinary creatures and extraordinary new animal behaviors. As we journey through our deep seas, coral reefs, open ocean, green seas and coasts we make these extraordinary new discoveries. But we now know that ocean health is under threat. Never has there been a more critical time to explore our remotest seas and to determine what the future will hold for our blue planet.

Abstract

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors for falls between fallers and nonfallers in a community-dwelling elderly population. A cross-sectional study was conducted in which 600 subjects aged 70 years or older were randomly selected from a telephone directory. All subjects completed a questionnaire about their history of falling, demographic characteristics, health status, functional status, and social support. Of the 600 subjects, 189 reported having fallen at least once during the previous year. Fallers had significantly higher rates of depression ($p = .001$), poor functional status ($p < .001$), and lack of social support ($p = .001$) than nonfallers. There were no significant differences between fallers and nonfallers in terms of age, gender, education, income, comorbidities, or medication use. These findings suggest that fallers may have more psychosocial problems than nonfallers.
