Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences between the self-reported health status of men and women who had been sexually abused as children and those who had not. A total of 100 men and 100 women who had been sexually abused as children and 100 men and 100 women who had not been sexually abused as children completed a questionnaire about their current health status. The results showed that men who had been sexually abused as children reported significantly higher rates of physical health problems than men who had not been sexually abused as children. Women who had been sexually abused as children reported significantly higher rates of psychological health problems than women who had not been sexually abused as children. The findings suggest that men and women who have been sexually abused as children may experience long-term health consequences.
