

Active Transport

Both diffusion and osmosis passively transport substances down concentration gradients. However, there are times when substances need to be transported against a concentration gradient.

Active transport is a process that transports substances against a concentration gradient. In other words, from a low concentration to a high concentration.

Active vs Passive Transport

Carrier proteins, embedded in the cell membrane, use energy to transport substances in and out of the cell. As active transport requires energy, it is an active process.

Active Transport in Plants

In plants, root hairs are tiny outgrowths that line the surface of the roots. They have a higher concentration of mineral ions than the dilute solutions in the soil. For plants to take up mineral ions, active transport occurs. This is because the plant cells are transporting the ions from a region of low concentration to a region of high concentration.

Therefore, substances are transported from the soil, which has a dilute concentration, to the cytoplasm of the root hair cells, where there's a more concentrated solution. As this process is active transport, it requires energy and the cells use this energy to transport the mineral ions through carrier proteins.
