Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported depression and anxiety among a sample of young adults in the United States. The study also aimed to explore the relationship between self-reported depression and anxiety and various demographic and psychological factors.

Methods: A cross-sectional survey was conducted using a nationally representative sample of young adults (ages 18-25) in the United States. The survey included a validated measure of self-reported depression and anxiety, as well as questions about demographic and psychological factors. Data were analyzed using descriptive statistics and logistic regression.

Results: The prevalence of self-reported depression was 12.5%, and the prevalence of self-reported anxiety was 18.7%. The study found that self-reported depression and anxiety were significantly associated with several factors, including female gender, lower income, and a history of mental health problems. Additionally, self-reported depression was associated with lower levels of education and employment, while self-reported anxiety was associated with higher levels of education and employment.

Conclusions: The study highlights the importance of addressing mental health issues in young adults. It suggests that interventions targeting factors such as income, education, and employment may be effective in reducing the prevalence of self-reported depression and anxiety. Further research is needed to explore the underlying mechanisms of these associations and to develop targeted interventions.

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a supervised walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group consisted of 20 women who did not participate in the walking program. The subjects were assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks for physical and psychological health. The physical health assessment included measurements of weight, body mass index (BMI), waist circumference, and blood pressure. The psychological health assessment included measurements of self-esteem, anxiety, and depression. The results of the study showed that the walking program had a significant positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the subjects. The walking program resulted in a significant decrease in weight, BMI, waist circumference, and blood pressure. The walking program also resulted in a significant increase in self-esteem and a significant decrease in anxiety and depression. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.
