Experimental Design Study - Study Guide

Definition:

- A plan for scientific investigation.
- A series of steps to be followed.
- A plan for the investigation, including the independent variable.
- A plan for the investigation, including the dependent variable.
- A plan for the investigation, including the control group.

Why is experimental design important?

It allows scientists to test their hypotheses and to draw conclusions about the results of their experiments. It also allows them to identify the factors that are responsible for the results of their experiments.

What are the components of an experimental design?

1. Independent Variable: The factor that is being tested or manipulated. (e.g., the amount of water given to plants).

2. Dependent Variable: The factor that is being measured or observed. (e.g., the height of the plants).

3. Control Group: A group of subjects that are not exposed to the independent variable. (e.g., plants that receive no water).

4. Experimental Group: A group of subjects that are exposed to the independent variable. (e.g., plants that receive water).

5. Replication: The process of repeating the experiment multiple times to ensure that the results are reliable.

6. Randomization: The process of randomly assigning subjects to the control and experimental groups to avoid bias.

7. Blinding: The process of keeping the researchers and participants unaware of the group assignments to avoid bias.

8. Statistical Analysis: The process of using statistical methods to analyze the data and determine if the results are significant.

How do you design an experiment?

1. Identify the problem or question. (e.g., "Does the amount of water affect the height of plants?")

2. Formulate a hypothesis. (e.g., "If the amount of water increases, then the height of the plants will also increase.")

3. Design the experiment. (e.g., "I will give the plants in my control group 0 mL of water each day, and the plants in my experimental group 10 mL of water each day. I will measure the height of the plants every week for 4 weeks.")

4. Conduct the experiment. (e.g., "I will give the control group 0 mL of water each day and the experimental group 10 mL of water each day. I will measure the height of the plants every week for 4 weeks.")

5. Analyze the data. (e.g., "I will use a t-test to compare the mean height of the control group to the mean height of the experimental group.")

6. Draw conclusions. (e.g., "The results of the experiment support my hypothesis. The amount of water does affect the height of the plants.")

7. Communicate the results. (e.g., "I will write a paper about my experiment and present it at a conference.")

Diagram illustrating the Experimental Design:

The diagram shows a plant in a pot. A cloud labeled "Sunlight" is above the plant. A watering can labeled "Water" is pouring water onto the plant. A label "Independent Variable" points to the watering can. A label "Dependent Variable" points to the plant. A label "Control Group" points to a plant in a pot that is not being watered. A label "Experimental Group" points to the plant in the pot that is being watered. A label "Replication" points to a group of plants in pots. A label "Randomization" points to a group of plants in pots. A label "Blinding" points to a group of plants in pots. A label "Statistical Analysis" points to a bar graph showing the height of the plants.

Bar Graph illustrating the Results:

The bar graph shows the height of the plants in the control group (0 mL of water) and the experimental group (10 mL of water) over 4 weeks. The control group shows a steady increase in height, while the experimental group shows a much faster increase in height.

Week	Control Group (0 mL)	Experimental Group (10 mL)
Week 1	10 cm	15 cm
Week 2	15 cm	25 cm
Week 3	20 cm	35 cm
Week 4	25 cm	45 cm
