

Stress, Pressure and Fatigue on Aircraft Maintenance Personnel

Luis F. F. M. Santos^{1,2}, R. Melicio^{2,3,4}

Abstract – This paper focuses on an analysis of the stress, the pressure and the fatigue as part of the Dirty Dozen and Human Factors procedures. An online international survey has been carried out to ascertain the professional levels of the fatigue, the stress and their pressure exposure. This work is a contribution to the aeronautical safety in order to alert authorities about the stress, the pressure and the fatigue that aircraft maintenance personnel suffers. Safety is the main driver in aviation related professions. Maintenance related personnel is constantly subjected to several external circumstances that might originate errors in the performance or evaluation in maintenance related tasks. Authorities have clearly regulated flight crew and air traffic controllers working and resting periods, but maintenance personnel regulations do not reflect the same procedures. The Aeronautical industry 4.0 with the upcoming digital transformation will increase the safety margin and it will reduce the aircraft maintenance ground time. 1. Introduction

Air transport is considered to be the safest method of transport [1], [2], due to the close interaction between aeronautical authorities, aviation industry (aircrafts), operators and aircraft maintenance industry [3]. As aircrafts become more reliable, humans have played a progressively more important causal role in aviation accidents [4]. Hence, aviation safety is the major concern and it is one of the principal drive factors of the civil aviation industry and regulatory purposes. Since the beginning of air transport, the need of rules and regulations have driven the aviation industry towards safer, and more reliable technologies and procedures.

The aircraft maintenance is a complex system, that requires sustained coordination, communication and cooperation between different work groups and teams including the aircraft maintenance and the airline, in order to ensure safety and efficient operations (minimizing error) [5]. Aircraft maintenance is highly regulated, safety critical, complex and competitive. There is the need to develop innovative solutions to address process efficiency without compromising safety and quality [5], particularly with regard to the work hours of maintenance personnel. It is not proper to talk about safety if the Flight Crew rests for 12 hours while the maintenance team works 16 hours or more. In [6] the aviation safety depends on minimizing error in all the facets of the system. While the role of flight deck human error has always received much emphasis, recently, more attention has been directed towards reducing human error in maintenance and inspection. Aviation maintenance and inspection tasks are part of a complex organization, where individuals perform different tasks in an environment with time pressures, sparse feedback, and sometimes difficult ambient conditions. These situational characteristics, in combination with generic human erring tendencies, result in different forms of error. In [7] a study on the mental workload in pilots is conducted. It shows a method to evaluate the mental distress and its affect on the eye pupils. This study has brought new insights to the pilot's performance during high mental workload. In [5] authors have also confirmed that aircraft maintenance is a highly regulated, safety critical, complex industry currently facing unprecedented challenges. Pressure is on aircraft manufacturers, from their customers, to design aircraft with pushed out maintenance schedules. The first key factors to improve flight safety has been introduced by ICAO, and it leads the industry to the development of methods to eliminate the accidents/incident common causes, such as the introduction of better technology, aircraft redundancies and systems compartmentalization and segregation. With these developments, together with organizational and human factors, the aviation industry has performed an
