THE LAST FRONTIERS A Journey Through the Borders of Humanity Andrea Pistolesi,2020-05-25 When I started photographing about forty years ago I was inspired by a world still full of ethnic and cultural diversity These have rapidly dissolved towards the end of the last century or the millennium if we are to be more historical When I visited Guatemala for the first time it was 1987 ninety percent of the population still wore traditional costumes When I returned there in 1998 this percentage had practically reversed ten years had been enough to erase centuries perhaps millennia of culture and traditions It was for this reason due to the lack of important cultural varieties that I devoted myself in the last twenty years the first of the new century or of the new millennium to the exploration of those fringes of the world where humanity lived still a pre globalization phase These were the edges of the humanized world Natural borders where life still followed ancient rhythms because it was conditioned by the power of the environment Or artificial political borders marked by history and by the contrasts of centuries The former were already fading thanks to the rapid spread of technology of the social networks that followed satellite television The latter seemed destined to disappear thanks to economic globalization the creation of free trade areas the elimination of visas and passports However lines remained where contrasts and conflicts were concentrated migratory flows and escapes from unlivable situations walls that divided a world of apparent well being from another that aspired to achieve the same conditions Then the reaction came The opposition to the openings of the borders the return of nationalisms the fears of the different have in fact slowed the commonality of thought that social networks were spreading over all humanity In my view this is only a nostalgic and futile slowdown of a huge and inescapable process Opening the umbrella when a dam gives way However it comes too late to save that cultural diversity that is now compromised What differentiates today those who are on both sides of our political lines is only the economic condition not the set of values that everyone carries in his backpack So these are no longer the boundaries that I was exploring before the places where diversity was evident confronted sometimes exploded Those last cultural fringes continue to fade even when the walls are raised
