SYSTEMS DESIGN: ACTIVITY-BASED COSTING AND MANAGEMENT

I. Questions

1. The three levels available are: Level 1, in which a company uses a plantwide overhead rate; Level 2, in which a company uses departmental overhead rates; and Level 3, in which a company uses activity-based costing.
2. New approaches to costing are needed because events of the last few decades have made drastic changes in many organizations. Automation has greatly decreased the amount of direct labor required to manufacture products; product diversity has increased in that companies are manufacturing a wider range of products and these products differ substantially in volume, lot size, and complexity of design; and total overhead cost has increased to the point in some companies that a correlation no longer exists between it and direct labor.
3. The departmental approach to assigning overhead cost to products relies solely on volume as an assignment base. Where diversity exists between products (that is, where products differ in terms of number of units produced, lot size, or complexity of production), volume alone is not adequate for overhead costing. Overhead costing based on volume will systematically overcost high-volume products and undercost low-volume products.
4. Process value analysis (PVA) is a systematic approach to gaining an understanding of the steps associated with a product or service. It identifies all resource-consuming activities involved in the production process and labels these activities as being either value-added or non-value-added. Thus, it is the beginning point in designing an activity-based costing system since management must know what activities are involved with each product before activity centers can be designated and cost drivers established. Also, PVA helps management to eliminate any non-value-added activities and thereby streamline operations and minimize costs.
5. The four general levels of activities are:
