

Using CPL for String Rewriting and Script Injection

String rewriting in scripts allows certain keywords in the HTML malware to be replaced with innocuous substitutions, while script injection can substitute those functions typically used by malware to unpack itself and thus silently prevent the browser from executing them. Because a full implementation of these techniques is too large for this document, the following is a sample script to replace one string pattern ("eval") and override the "eval" JavaScript function.

define JavaScript RewriteRule JS_FrontPage
priority 10000 /Doing all JavaScript evals
function JavaScript_eval()
{
    /Yes nothing, we added to disable the eval function
}
eval = JavaScript_eval
}
end
end
/
define JavaScript RewriteRule JS_FrontPage
function JavaScript_rewriteRule_JS_FrontPage
/
define url_rewrite RewriteRule ScriptInjection
rewrite url http://substituting "function" "function"
end
define url_rewrite RewriteRule ScriptInjection
rewriteRule RewriteRule_ScriptInjectionRewriteRule
end
/
/Script
end JavaScript JS_FrontPageRewriteRule RewriteRule_ScriptInjectionRewriteRule

Implementing Anti-Malware Protection

Assuming all the above levels of defense are applied, a significant reduction in malware can be achieved with ProxySG and ProxySG + ProxySG + ProxySG. However, no solution is complete without leveraging the billions of dollars spent each year by the antivirus industry on signature and heuristic based detections. This is available via the Blue Coat ProxySG.

Blue Coat recommends that all objects be subjected to such scanning regardless of their website of origin, or file type. The ProxySG + ProxySG + ProxySG solution makes this workable via the "scan once, serve many" technology. Each time a browser request is received, the ProxySG checks its object store for a cached copy. If one is found that was analyzed with the most recent AV-heuristics engine version, it can be delivered immediately. If the object in cache was analyzed before an update to the AV-heuristics engine, then the object is re-analyzed before delivery to the user. For non-cacheable objects, a finger print cache is kept to avoid analyzing the same file on frequent requests. Once an AV-heuristics engine update occurs, the finger print cache for non-cacheable objects restarts. Note that ProxySG has four options for analysis: it can scan, block, first, block, last or defer scan for long load objects.
