

Marx, Kafka and Jung: The Appearance of Species-being

James M. Glass

Why Marx, Kafka and Jung? It is in their implicit commentary on the possibility of "species-being" that this trilogy becomes interesting; while it is only Marx who addresses himself directly to the concept (and in his early writings it serves as a crucial pivot in his thought) the use of Kafka and Jung can highlight the formulation through reflection in contrasting symbologies. To interpret Marx through Jung—or what should be argued, to interpret the conception of "species-being" through a Jungian analytical construct—points to a dimension of the idea that has considerable importance for many young people today, and might account in part for the rather romantic attraction of the early writings. "Species-being" reveals a kind of an "ideal", a possibility that action can and should realize. As an ethical formulation, species-life means redemption, a revitalization not only of man's physical existence and its organization but also his psychic life, his consciousness and the structures of perception that will enable him to live and act in a way liberated from the values, pursuits, objectives and thoughts of the "old society." Jung allows us to explore some of the implications of the Marxian notion of "universality", of seeing "species-life" as that which is uncovered through action, the basic "commonality" of mankind. The argument is meant to be suggestive; and we see Jung providing considerable help in trying to reach the meaning of this aspect of Marx's thought.

As for Kafka, a contrast emerges, that both explains something about Kafka's judgements on mankind and the vast difference in the faith of both Marx and Kafka in action. It is that realm, the possibility of action, that the pessimism and futility of Kafka's formulations become most apparent, and Marx's visionary romanticism most compelling. But, the contrast also tells us something about the role of knowledge. For Kafka, nothing redeems; knowledge imposes on us a curse, allowing us to conceive our own perversity in graphic terms. Marx, however, takes an entirely different position: philosophy possesses power; it will reveal the structures of the liberation, lifting man out of the suffering of existence in order to redeem his Being.
