The Stranger: Summary

The story, The Stranger depicts life of 'comrades' living in the Arizona desert. The campers had captured the stranger whose friends had committed suicide out fear of arrest by Apaches. That evening the stranger joins the rest of the camp at the campfire where he begins to narrate his story. He and a group of four other men were on their way across the Arizona desert. Their journey was marred by myriad of challenges as evident in his monologue that it had become a battle of survival. Coupled with lack of food and fear of attack by the Apaches, the convoy of men did not take long before they were spotted (Blume, 7).

It is in the attack orchestrated by the Apaches that their animals were taken from them. They managed to salvage their rifles and kept themselves safe but only for a moment. Soon they had hit a dead end and it was a matter of time before their assailants caught up with them. Due to their pride, the men decided to shoot themselves as opposed to have the Apaches capture them. After his four friends shot themselves, it was now the turn of the stranger (Blume 13). Unfortunately, the campers captured and took him to their camp. It is here that he is narrating his story.

Use of Irony

The author uses irony as the major stylistic device to keep the story interesting. First, it is until the end of the story that reader comes to learn that the stranger failed to kill himself due to cowardice. Unfortunately, the campers arrested him and he is in their camp. Blume explicate that the theme of irony comes out when the twist ending reveals that the narrator was among the captives (9). The captain threatens to throw them into the fire if they are unable to keep vigilance. Besides, the stranger disappears into oblivion after the end of his narration that catches the attention of the captain of the camp.

It is ironical that, contrary to the major objectives of adventures across the Arizona desert, it turned out to be a miserable journey and a captivity of the stranger and death
