

The diagram illustrates the Business Process Management (BPM) lifecycle. At the center is a box labeled "Business Process Management (BPM)". Surrounding this central box are eight other boxes, each representing a stage in the lifecycle, connected by arrows in a circular flow. The stages are: Design, Model, Execute, Monitor & Control, Improve, Analyze, Design, and Model. The top box is "Design", followed by "Model", "Execute", "Monitor & Control", "Improve", "Analyze", "Design", and "Model". The central box is "Business Process Management (BPM)".

Transitions include 'Withdrawal', 'Deposit', and 'Transfer'. The flow of tokens is indicated by arrows and labels like 'Withdrawal', 'Deposit', and 'Transfer'.

	A Data Object element can optionally reference a (optional) element, which is the state of data contained in a Data Object.
	A Data Store process is a mechanism for address to retrieve or update stored information that will persist beyond the scope of a process.
	A Data Input is an external input for the whole process.
	A Data Output is a data result of the whole process.
	The Collection Data Object represents collections of information.

The diagram illustrates the Message Flow pattern. It shows a sequence of messages between two components, with a central component (a car icon) receiving a message. The diagram includes a vertical sequence of two yellow boxes labeled 'Car', a horizontal sequence of two car icons, and a central car icon receiving a message from a dashed line representing a message flow.

Two challenges are often associated with defining a sequence flow: how to specify an endpoint, and how to specify a control element that is not a message.

The idea of message endpoints can be specified by extending the flow and endpoint tags.

Message flow endpoints (whether the start or end of a sequence flow) always flow into or out of a component, and are always a message source. For Message Flow, the endpoints will be a component capable of sending or receiving a message.
