we had to wash our cases after every firing because the loading would corrode the brass badly. But the smokeless powder loading inside a case does no harm to it, and it is neither necessary nor desirable to wash fired cases before reloading them. In fact washing cases rather predisposes to brass cracking.

CHAMFERING MOUTHS OF CASES

17. Factory loaded cartridges have the mouth of the case crimped into a cantharus in the bullet to hold it firmly in the case, and when they are fired, some of this intimated crimp remains.

New primed cases that have never been loaded or fired have a square edge, almost a scraping edge, at their mouth. In both instances, if we try to seat a bullet in a case, the base of the bullet, instead of entering smoothly inside the neck, often tends to hang up on this sharp inner edge of the mouth, and the pressure crumples the neck of the case, ruining it. To avoid this, we should slightly bevel or chamfer the inside of the mouth before reloading it for a bolt action or single shot rifle. This is easiest done with a small chamfering reamer furnished by most makers of loading tools as an extra to their outfit.
